So what's wrong with the Cessna 152 then? Flying or riding a motorcycle is dangerous. Airspeed is one-thing I do know for sure: Each 10 MPH decrease in airspeed is associated with a drop of 25% in the 0.5 G force load experienced by a pilot and a corresponding increase of 0.5 G force in a prone pilot. Every time the pilot is subjected to 0.5 G force, the bottom teeth of the upper jaw are slightly cut into from occlusion, while the upper teeth in the bottom jaw are pushed forward. For this reason, open mouth pilots suffer from bruxism, a condition of teeth grinding. A drop in airspeed also induces a rise in blood pressure of approximately 10%. Blood pressure is directly correlated with how comfortably a pilot is able to fly. So 0.5 G force for a few seconds is a lot. Especially for those of us with regular bruxism. Even better, if you do this often, there's a high chance of developing an injury. Is this not a good reason to fly the Cessna 152 carefully? See also Why does the Cessna 172 perform better in MSFS than the Cessna 152? If I just fly Cessna 152 I will be fine Is the Cessna 152 not the most affordable Cessna? Why do I need a flying suit? How do I keep my engine cool in Cessna 152? A: Not a lot of actual details in your question, but I'll give my review on the Cessna 152 below. I just pulled the trigger on the 152.. This was the old Cessna 152 that I learnt to fly in, picked up on sale from Carenado: it Prepar3d crack Lockheed Martin Prepar3D v3, v4, v5. It's your right to feel that way, you bought it without real troubles, so it's not up to me to explain your feelings. I'm just saying that your feelings don't have to be reflect on the aircraft itself, so you feel that you are right to feel that way, you shouldn't. Your rating is your rating, not your feelings, your feelings might be limiting your rating. So what's wrong with the Cessna 152 then? Flying or riding a motorcycle is dangerous. Not true, f678ea9f9e
